The register of delicious tastes includes Blueberry Lavender, Mokko Scotch Chip and Poncho Verde. Guidance on Virginia's Eastern Shore over concerns about air pollution has led city officials to crack down on these disputed vehicles. The City of London cracks on ice cream trucks. Starting this year, beloved carriers of frozen sweet treats will be banned from different neighborhoods, due to concerns about air pollution. The trucks run on diesel, which emits harmful black carbon associated with respiratory disease and nitrogen dioxide. At parks, they continue idly by to launch freezers that keep ice cream cold and nourish soft-serve machines. According to london bylaws, they must change locations every 15 minutes and not return to the same trading place on the same shopping day, but this rule is not always enforced. Of added concern is that ice cream trucks gravitate to areas such as schools, playgrounds and parks, and that's where city officials are working to reduce traffic congestion and pollution as quickly as possible. City regulations have evolved in recent years to reflect air quality problems. The introduction of a low emissions zone meant that many drivers had to invest in new, cleaner vehicles; and now the low emissions zone, or ULEZ, which came into force on April 8, means that trucks operating in central London are paid a daily fee. Camden has already banned them on 40 streets, and The Guardian reports that it goes further this year: It's putting no ice cream trademarks and increasing patrols of law enforcement officers in those areas, with fines for drivers caught selling ice cream there. Caroline Russell, an assembly member for the Green Party, acknowledges the frustration that both children and truck owners will be affected by. She told the Standard: No one wants to be fun police or see people lose their business. But people don't want sideways asthma with their ice cream. This is a serious public health issue. The ULEZ charge has helped, but we can't have a situation where you can pay to get dirty. Some areas, such as Richmond and Tower Hamlets, are looking at installing power points where ice cream vans can connect to a power source rather than keep their engines running. This seems like a worthy solution to the problem, although there is still the issue of explosive jiggs that apparently disgrace many urban dwellers. Perhaps city officials should take a lesson from Brazil, where ice cream sellers hawk their wares out of powerless freezer boxes on wheels they either like a harrow wheel or attached to a bicycle, always with an umbrella umbrella Wheel's charming sun-powered cafe, wind and biogas made of recycled coffee grounds are also available. Both are proof that it doesn't have to be challenging to get ice cream fixes. Photo by Ralph Morse/The LIFE Picture Collection/Getty Images This is a song that has launched children into action for generations - once they hear the shimmering sound of Pop Goes the Weasel or The Entertainer, kids give up play equipment or pickup ball, and race to catch an ice cream truck. The history of ice cream street sellers dates back to the nineteenth century and is shaped by advances in technology, and fortunately sanitation. While much has changed since toddlers first sold ice cream dishes from trolleys cooled by ice ripples, little has changed about the ice cream truck over the past few generations. Children in the 1970s and 1980s also ran to the truck as soon as the same recognizable music sounded. The main difference is that the treats sold then - Fat Frogs and Mickey Mouse-shaped ice cream bars - have been replaced by today's popular cartoon characters. While some companies now allow parents to track a truck using GPS, the time set is still the same: customers approach an open-sided truck, view menus and desecre orders. Advertising - Continue reading below In the U.S., the ice cream basket began as an urban phenomenon in which working-class workers bought a small dish of ice cream that he or she licked clean. The dish was then returned to the seller, wiped and loaded with fresh scoop for the new customer. Customers with more money or a healthy fear of infectious diseases opted for ice cream sandwiches. Milk was not pasteurized in the U.S. until the 1890s, which meant that any dairy product was potentially flavored with bacteria that caused scarlet fever, diphtheria and bovine tuberculosis. Ice cream poisoning was a common event and was regularly reported in the news. Newspapers described ice cream poisoning epidemics in which dozens of fair-goers, picnic attendees and party guests were killed or killed. Health officials, however, initially ignore dairy contamination and blame ice cream poisoning on artificial flavors, particularly vanilla. By the beginning of the century, ice cream hygiene had improved dramatically and fairs were no longer afraid to order cold treats. At the 1904 World's Fair in St. Louis, there was a convenient outing premiere - an ice cream cone. Thin, crisp waffle has long been a favorite dessert, and rolling waffles into a cone wasn't a new idea. The new idea was to glean ice cream in a cone, and several men who sold concessions at the famous fair fought to recognize who the real creator was. The growing public interest in ice cream has been driven by both technological progress and social change. In the early 1920s, advances in refrigeration meant that electric coolers replaced supplies of ice. coolers were much more portable, portable, made it possible to place a chilled ice box on the car. At the same time, the early 1920s also saw the beginning of the ban and the end of easy access to daily fascination with wine, beer or liquor for liquor per year. For many Americans, the comfort of fast food and sweets has replaced indulgence lost by banned spirits on spirits. The popularity of ice cream parlors and trucks has soared in this era. The first ice cream truck was credited to Harry Burt of Youngstown, Ohio, who was the creator of the Good Humor brand. Burt was already delivering ice cream from a motorized vehicle when he had the idea to place chocolate covered ice cream bars on a stick. His new Good Humor ice cream sucker was easy and clean to eat, which gave him the idea to sell it directly from his truck to consumers on the street. Ice cream sold in salons or shops became a luxury item during the Depression. But ice cream trucks such as the Good Humor Burt brand are able to survive depression through a low-cost product. Many consumers couldn't afford large ticket items, but they could afford nickel for ice cream. During this time, sellers began offering economic items, such as twin popsiculas, which the parents broke in half and shared with their two children. Good Humor trucks and other branded businesses had new competition during the Depression: the street kid returned with cheap treats made with questionable sanitation practices. But most toddlers could not survive the rationing of sugar during World War II. Postwar production of ice cream flourished and so did the competition. Mister Softee was founded in Philadelphia in 1956 by two brothers who created a soft ice cream machine built specifically for the truck. While Good Humor sold its fleet in the 1970s to focus on grocery store sales, Mister Softee trucks are still on the streets, not to mention the plethora of competitors selling original treats, as well as pre-packed favorites of a new generation of kids listening to hear a familiar jingle on a hot summer's day.
